

THE CITIES NEVER SLEEP

When we talk about cities, we often focus on their architecture, food, and culture. However, there are also quiet aspects of everyday life that society turns into noise. Cities, designed for people, continue to function even with planning mistakes. The diversity of individuals—elderly, adults, children, animals—enriches these spaces, making them more vibrant and complex. These are environments created to be observed, judged, and most importantly, inhabited.

Security is linked to the experience of inhabiting the city, where there are eyes everywhere: architecture watches the streets, and the city never rests. The versatility in the use of spaces adds essential richness, as nothing is meant for just one purpose. In the end, the key question remains: what is the true purpose of a city?

Urban centers don't come with an instruction manual; society, with its tacit knowledge, acts as the perfect guide. Without formal explanations, people instinctively know to stop at crosswalks, dispose of their trash in the correct bins, and respect nature. These are invisible bonds where everyone shares responsibility, though it is not explicitly imposed.
