

urban living

urban living is unique in each city, no city is like the other.

Types of people, population, location, architecture, its history, culture. All those aspects shape each city individually. In addition, every person perceives the city differently. What means lifequality and leisure for one, is stress and oversupply for another. But what all cities have in common, they are a mirror of society and political situation of the present, the past and the future. You see the scares of past wars, the bad architectural decisions of the modern era and the potencial and what we need to fix for a good working city in the future.

For me personally a city (of millions) is a whole disagreement. It can be seen as safespace cause of it's anonymity, everybody is watching but nobodys cares. At the same time people feel as isolated as never before. Public transport offers mobility freedom, but you often get stuck cause of Trafficissues. A city can be disgusting and ugly and vibrant and beautiful at the same time. Sometimes I just feel like it's hard to find quality while there is quantity.
